Underemployment of undergraduates is an issue of concern globally, and higher education institutions worldwide are utilizing various measures to increase the employability of their students. In order to resolve the problem of structural unemployment in China, the Chinese government has implemented a policy to encourage local undergraduate universities to transform into universities of applied science. Drexel's cooperative education program offers an interesting model for China's education reform agenda. Through an examination of Drexel's cooperative education model, this presentation offers suggestions for Chinese Universities serving primarily undergraduate students.
