Academic book publishing remains an important way to share our research and expertise with the academic community and outside world. However, how do you go about finding a publisher and organizing your project so that you will be successful? Niko Pfund speaks from many years of experience in the world of academic publishing.

Niko Pfund is the Global Academic Publisher of Oxford University Press and President of Oxford University Press, USA. A graduate of Amherst College, he began his career at Oxford in 1987 as an editorial assistant in law and social science before moving to New York University Press in 1990. At NYU Press, he was an editor, then editor in chief before becoming director in 1996. He returned to Oxford in 2000 as Academic Publisher and is responsible for oversight of the Press's scholarly and research publishing across the humanities, social sciences, science, law and medicine, spanning the Press's offices in Oxford, New York and Delhi. He has given talks at the Library of Congress, the World Bank, George Washington University, UNC, Fordham, Oberlin, USC, Yale, UT-Austin, NYU, MIT, Princeton, Williams, Columbia, Amherst and many other institutions, as well as at a variety of scholarly conferences and publishing institutes.
